Executive Summary

One hot summer day in Coalinga, we wanted a cold treat after hanging out with friend, but there were not many choices nearby. That gave us the idea to start a snowcone food truck with fun flavors, colorful toppings, and fast service for all ages. We plan to sell at parks, games, fairs, and busy spots around town. We will start with one truck, use social media to tell people where we are, and later grow by adding more trucks in nearby towns. With good service, fun treats, and fair prices, we believe our business can become a favorite in the community.

Industry Overview

Food trucks are popular because people like bold flavors, healthier choices, and fun drinks. Most customers are young adults because they want fast, cheap, and trendy food. Food trucks use social media, word of mouth, events, and busy spots to get customers. Their main competitors are taco trucks, burger trucks, and dessert trucks that also sell quick and affordable food. Starting a food truck can be hard because of costs, permits, competition, and finding good places to park. The industry makes about $2.8 billion a year and is growing, but prices and competition can affect sales. Food trucks must follow health rules, get permits, and follow local parking laws. They also do better in warm weather and slower in cold or rainy seasons.

Market Analysis

Target Market: Slush Rush will operate in Fresno County, focusing on outdoor areas such as parks, school zones, community events, and sports games. Geographically, the truck will target neighborhoods and public gathering spaces, especially during hot weather. Demographically, the main audience will be children, teenagers, and young adults along with families. Economically, the business will target low- to middle-income customers by offering affordable snow cones and drinks. Psychologically, Slush Rush appeals to fun, cool, and active individuals who enjoy refreshing slush, especially during the hot climate.

Food Truck Regulations Paragraph (Fresno County)

Operating a snow cone truck like Slush Rush in Fresno County requires compliance with local health and safety regulations. Mobile food vendors must obtain a Permit to Operate from the Fresno County Department of Public Health and pass a vehicle inspection before opening for business. Additionally, all food trucks must operate from an approved commissary kitchen, which is used for cleaning, storage, and food preparation, and must be visited daily. Snow cone trucks typically fall under Mobile Food Facilities (MFF) or Compact Mobile Food Operations (CMFO) and are limited to simple food preparation such as shaving ice and serving drinks. Vendors must also have food handler certifications, follow the California Retail Food Code, and ensure food safety standards are met at all times. Operating without proper permits can result in fines or being shut down, so maintaining compliance with all county regulations and inspections is essential.

Competitive Analysis

In the Coalinga area, slush rush will have both direct and indirect competition. Direct competitors include other dessert or drink food trucks that sell sweets or cold beverages, while indirect competitors include savory food trucks, restaurants, and convenience stores that attract the same customers. A key strength of The Slush Rush is its customizable snow cones, house-made syrups, and fun, high-energy branding, which create a unique experience. Many competitors focus on heavier foods or basic menu items, which can be a weakness, especially in hot weather when people want something light and refreshing. The Slush Rush can take advantage of this by offering quick service, creative options, and a strong presence at local events to stand out and attract more customers.

Organizational Plan

Our lead snow cone maker is Maritza, she handles all the different flavors alongside Sidney. These have unmatched chemistry that causes them to know what each other is thinking. One could toss the ice in the air and the other would catch it. Lastly in charge of taking orders and dealing with customers is Brooke. Her friendly personality makes each customer feel special. Sometimes, the conversations flow so well, the customer forgot why they are even there in the first place. We believe not one person is in charge, we are a trio and everyone has a say.

Operational Plan

Our snow cone truck will be in Coalinga, California. We'll need to have a legal spot to park like downtown by the plaza or keck park with approval from the city. We'll also need a clean and approved truck setup with running water, workers to take orders and make drinks, equipment like an ice shaver, freezer, and syrup station, and clear steps for cleaning, handling food safely, and making each order quickly and finding ways to make it better every time.

Financial Plan

The Slush Rush is expected to grow steadily over time, with increasing sales next month as awareness builds, strong profits within a year, and potential expansion or multiple trucks within 3–5 years. The business will stay financially healthy by managing costs, keeping inventory efficient, and maintaining consistent sales through good customer service and marketing. Key assets include the truck itself, ice shavers, syrups, cups, cash on hand, and inventory supplies. Financial records will be handled by one of the owners, likely with shared oversight to ensure accuracy and organization.

Growth Plan

In the next few years, our snowcone truck plans to add 1–2 more trucks to expand around Coalinga and nearby towns. These trucks will be placed in busy areas and at local events to reach more customers. We also plan to hire a few workers for each new truck. To manage growth, we will keep our menu and service the same at every truck, train workers well, and stay active on social media so customers know where we are and what to expect.

Contingency Plan

Every business faces risks and challenges, and The Slush Rush is no exception. One of the biggest challenges is the seasonal nature of the product, as demand for snow cones is typically higher during warmer months and may drop significantly during colder weather. In the event of an emergency, such as equipment failure, supply shortages, or unexpected weather conditions, the team would need to have a backup plan in place like as maintaining extra inventory, having access to repair services, or temporarily relocating to areas with higher foot traffic. If sales are lower than expected, the business could expand by having one of the workers go outside in a snow cone outfit to attract customers. Offering promotions or discounts to attract more customers, or increasing its presence at local events and on social media to boost visibility could also be something we try. Adjusting pricing, improving customer service, and exploring catering opportunities are also potential strategies to help maintain steady revenue and keep the business successful despite challenges.
